

CANDY

It doesn't have to be Valentine's Day for candy lovers and chocoholics to relish sweet tastes.

It is estimated that 99% of North American households buy candy at least once a week.

In a word

The word candy is derived from the Arabic word qandi, meaning "something made with sugar." Sugary treats are known as confections, and a confectioner is someone who specializes in making sweets.

By definition

Candy is a sweet confection made with sugar, other sweeteners and flavors. Confectionery items include a variety of hard candies, lollipops, candy bars, chocolate, candy floss and other sweet snacks. Desserts such as ice cream, cakes and puddings are not considered confections.

Early sweets

Honey was probably the first sweet snack enjoyed by prehistoric man, and it is likely that he dipped fruit and nuts into honey. We know for sure that the ancient Egyptians (about 3,500 years ago) combined fruits, nuts and honey to make candy. Archaeologists have discovered marshmallow (honey that is flavored and thickened with the sap of the marshmallow plant) and licorice treats in pharaohs' tombs.

Honey was the sweetener of choice until the discovery of sugar cane, which was first cultivated in ancient China, India and Persia about A.D. 500. Sugar made its way to Europe around A.D. 1100.

Native Americans boiled the sweet sap of the maple tree to make maple sugar. In 1519, Spanish explorers in Mexico found cacao, from which chocolate is made. Chocolate was first served as a medicinal beverage. The chocolate bar was invented in the late 1870s.

Medicinal uses

Many early sweets were consumed as medical treatments for digestive troubles. Today's cough drop and peppermint stick can be traced back to this tradition. Licorice root mixed with honey or sugar has been used to treat arthritis, asthma, constipation, depression, fatigue and sore throats. Jujubes and marshmallows are other examples of ancient medicines becoming modern candies.

Valentine candy

In 1868, Richard Cadbury invented the first Valentine candy box. Decorated with a painting of his daughter and her kitten, this Valentine treat was a great success. The early colonists first made candy hearts by scratching love notes on candy. Today, about 8 billion candy hearts are made each year with the familiar "Be Mine" and "Kiss Me" inscriptions on them.
